This style of foundation is used very extensively for all descriptions of pavements excepting asphalt. With brick pavements the practice of placing a layer of bricks flatwise on the bed of sand, covering them with a thin coating of sand, and paving on it the wearing surface on edge, is quite common, and produces what is called the two course pavement. Still another method consists in covering the layer of sand with tarred boards, upon which the sand cushion and brick on edge are paved herring-bone style, producing the Hale Pavement. In this, however, the broken stone is generally omitted, the boards being separated from the subsoil by from four to six inches of sand only. These expedients tend to better the distribution of the weights brought upon the pavement, and have the merit of economy in first cost, but they are obviously inadequate except where the subsoil is exceptionally good and the traffic very moderate. The method of combination is quite defective. When gravel is used that is free from loam, it will not compact under the roller, and if it does contain loam the water which comes from the subsoil, and percolates through it, is liable to carry the soluble substances with it down the gradients, and leave the pavement unevenly supported. When broken stone and gravel, or broken stone alone, forms the foundation course, it is expected to be porous, and act, to some extent, as a subsoil drain. The voids,...
