It was at first intended to march on the 5th of January, 1842, but the chiefs having stated that their escort would not be ready until the day after, the departure was postponed. During the last fortnight the ground had been covered with snow, the thermometer being as low as zero. The force on leaving Cabul consisted of about four thousand five hundred fighting men, and the camp followers, women, and children amounted to about three times that number: the strength of the 44th was nineteen officers and four hundred and thirtyeight fighting men, in which numbers were included Brigadier Shelton, twelve boys, and thirty-four sick. 6 Jan. At nine o'clock in the morning of the 6th of January, the advance, under Brigadier Anquetil, consisting of the 44th, with some Sappers and Miners, one squadron of Irregular Horse, and three mountain train guns, moved off. The main column was commanded by Brigadier Shelton, and the rear-guard by Colonel Chambers. It was after midnight before the rear-guard reached Bygram, only five miles from Cabul; here the camp, if it could be so called, a few tents only being pitched, presented a sad picture of desolation, the face of the country being one uninterrupted scene of snow. Ever! Brigadier Shelton had no tent, and for six days and six nights was exposed on a bed of snow, with no other shelter than the canopy of heaven; a fire was out...
