ON THE FORCE OF TENSES IN THE PROHIBITIVE. In the American Journal of Philology, Vol. xv, No. 2, Elmer has discussed the force of tenses in the prohibitive. His conclusions were that the perfect subjunctive occurs in this idiom wherever special energy or emotion on the speaker's part is present, the present subjunctive in other cases. These conclusions seemed to me so plausible that I accepted them and incorporated them in my Latin Grammar (276); cf. Appendix, 358, 1, d. Three subsequent readings of Plautus, however, tended to shake my confidence in the validity of the theory, and prompted me to institute a fresh examination of the question for Plautus, in whose plays the construction is best represented.1 The results of this examination are here given. The investigation of this question is naturally a somewhat delicate one. Where the...
